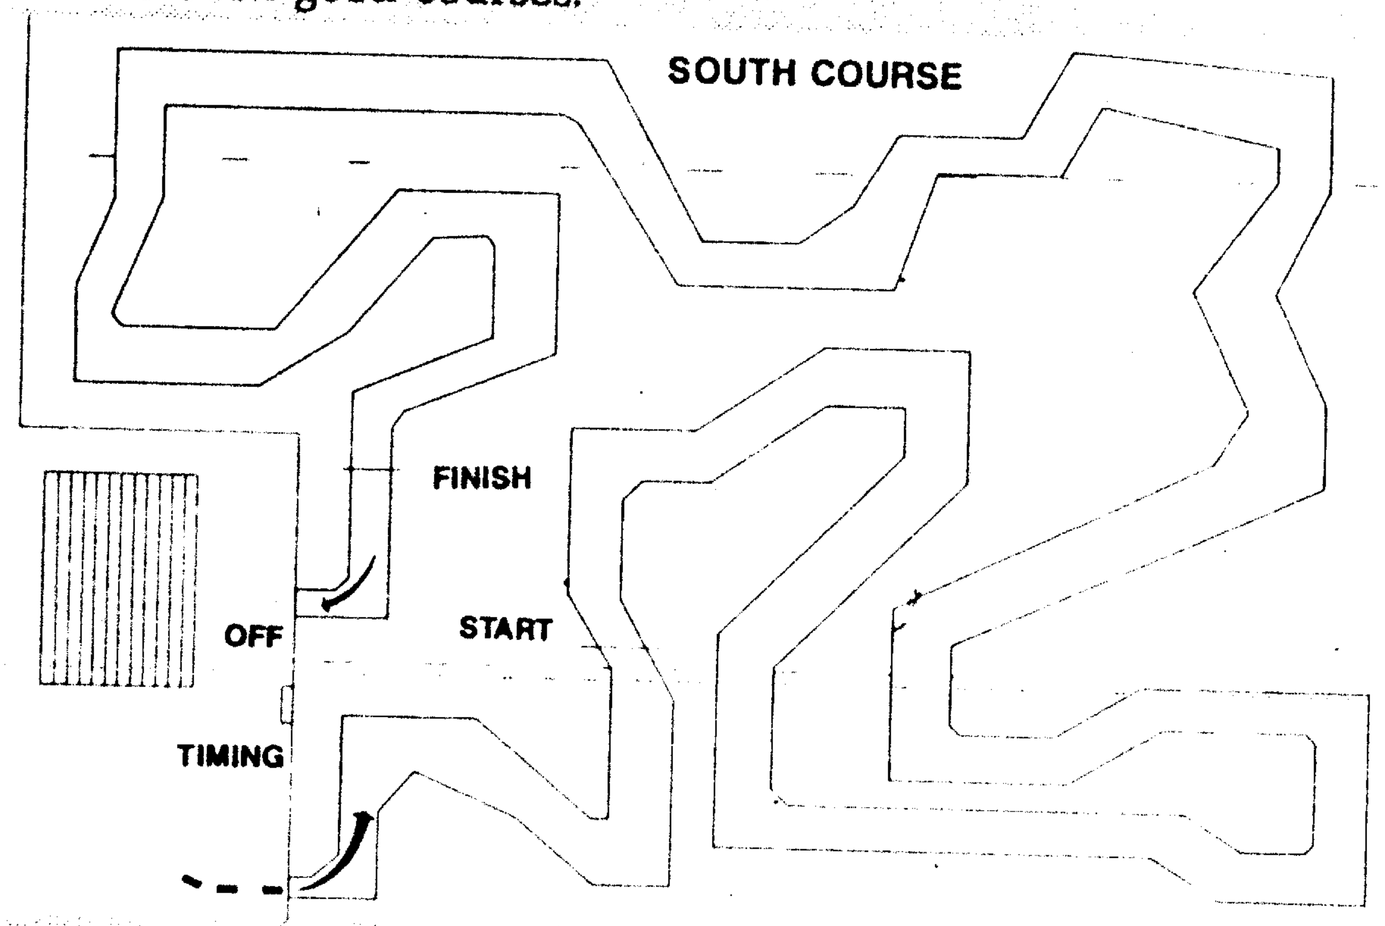
The Courses

I hated the south course. And I wasn't alone. No, there was not a thing wrong with it. It was, in fact, a championship-caliber challenge which has not been possible at Salina until the event moved to the new site.

What I hated most about it was that I drove it badly. So did a number of others, mostly from east of the Rockies, whose primary beef was that it "wasn't what they were used to." But then, there were some Left Coast folk who had the same thing to say about the north course.

Must've been good courses.



If people only want to drive what they are used to, they should stay home. One beneficial side effect of the National Championships is to experience different ways of doing things. The courses, designed by San Francisco Region's Gary Walton and New England Region's Harry Mann, certainly provided plenty of opportunity to do just that, as well as two excellent challenges. The south course, designed by Walton, was generous almost to excess, but that very generosity became a trap into which the unwary fell. Wide boundaries and geometric edging lulled drivers into excess speed that sucked them much too deep into corners. Even with 30 or 40 feet in width, Walton said, "there's only an eight-foot-wide course here—the course that's the right line for your car."

Walton began his course with an interesting device never before seen at a National: a warm-up. From the stage line, drivers made a left, a right, drove a short straight and then another left before ever breaking the beam to start the clock.

"It gives you a chance to get your car working, to get your head working," Walton said.

Walton's course seemed full of great 180s, sometimes two linked together, nearly always with wide entries, wide exits, and plenty of room to screw up the middle as well. Interesting was one spritz across the drainage hump that was virtually a blind setup, and which if a driver waited way late to make the turn, he was left with a straight shot through what otherwise was a bit of a jog.

Mann, on the other hand, seemed enamored of slaloms. Early in the course was a low-speed curving slalom. And near the end was a much longer and faster slalom that, halfway through, jogged through an offset. Opposite-direction linked turns popped up in several places. Midway through the course, the fastest acceleration section ended in a 270-degree hook.

Strange thing about this course; in many cases, the harder one tried, the slower one went. Where Walton's course could be charged, Mann's could not. It had to be finessed. On many occasions drivers' first runs on the north course were their best.
